The aim of this work was to quantify the effect of organic acids on the composition of the organic and inorganic fractions of model surfaces. Using scanning ion-conductance microscopy (SICM) we were able to profile the distribution of organic and inorganic material in model apatitic and dentin mineralized pellicles. Protonated solutions of the organic acids aspartic acid (pH 2) and malic acid (pH 3) were used to remove organic material from the mineralized surface, and to test the effect of non-protonated organic acids. Removal of organic material from the model surface was found to depend on the pH of the acid solution, and was associated with a decrease in the anionic to cationic and hydrophobic to hydrophilic ratios. The increased concentration of inorganic material on these acid treated model surfaces was further evident from the close to near-zero values of the contact angles. The results clearly show that the removal of organic material from the mineralized surface, and the increase in the presence of inorganic material on the surface, occurs even when the organic acids are not protonated. A simulation was performed to predict the time scale of these acid-base
